Midseason awards breakdown: from disappointments to surprises

Logan M. Jones | Collegian

Head football coach Bill Snyder, now in his 20th season at the helm for the Wildcats, has his team off to an undefeated, 5-0 start, ranking in the top 20 national polls.

Tyler Dreiling

The college football season is nearly half gone, and now is an excellent time to look at some of the key elements that have made the 2011 season what it's been. Here is my breakdown of midseason awards, in all their glory.

PLAYER OF THE YEAR: ROBERT GRIFFIN III, QUARTERBACK, BAYLOR

The guy was 21 of 31 for 346 yards and five touchdowns — in his only loss of the season. RG3 has played out of his mind, collecting 19 touchdowns and one interception through five games. No one has played better or more efficiently. Griffin should pack his bags now for a trip to the Heisman Trophy presentation this winter.

Also in the running: Andrew Luck, Stanford; Denard Robinson, Michigan.

COACH OF THE YEAR: BILL SNYDER, KANSAS STATE

The Legend is doing it again. Picked by some to win three games this season, the Wildcats are 5-0 and in the national top 20. Snyder's done it with defense, the running game, clock control and athletes who were not highly recruited. That is the precise recipe for a COY nod.

Also in the running: Dabo Swinney, Clemson; Mark Hudspeth, Louisiana-Lafayette; Ron Zook, Illinois.

GAME OF THE YEAR: MICHIGAN 35, NOTRE DAME 31

Let's see. Three lead-changing touchdowns in the final 1:12, in the first-ever night game at Michigan Stadium, between two college football historical powerhouses, in a nationally televised primetime game. What more could you ask for?

Also in the running: BYU 28, Utah State 24; Kansas State 36, Baylor 35.

SURPRISE OF THE YEAR: ILLINOIS

What K-State has done is incredible, but we've seen it before from Bill Snyder. Meanwhile, the Illini are 5-0 with a victory over Arizona State to their credit. Ron Zook has his team sitting atop the Big Ten standings at 2-0 with all of their toughest remaining games at home. Look out, because seeing Illinois in the Rose Bowl might not be a far-fetched idea.

Also in the running: K-State, Clemson.

DISAPPOINTMENT OF THE YEAR: TEXAS A&M

For a team with as much talent as the Aggies, Texas A&M has no business having a 3-2 record. The Aggies gave up two large second-half leads, the first of which ended their hope for a national title; the second thrashed Big 12 Championship hopes. Preseason expectations are what sealed this award.

Also in the running: Maryland, Ohio State, Miami.

COACH ON THE HOT SEAT:

TURNER GILL, KANSAS

Expectations might not have been very high for the Jayhawks, but the KU defense has been non-existent. Seriously, I'm not sure KU knows what the word defense means. It allowed 70 points to Oklahoma State, 56 by halftime, and over 700 yards of offense to Georgia Tech. Gill needed to show improvement in that category this season, and things have only gotten worse.

Also in the running: Mike Sherman, Texas A&M; Larry Porter, Memphis.

It has been quite the entertaining start to the season. Here's to the second half being just as fun.

Alum Tye Berger enjoying life out of school

Mark Kern
assistant sports editor

Tye Berger is a K-State graduate who is now a lawyer and also runs bringonthecats.com. Tye sat down for an interview to discuss what he does for a living and to give advice to people who want a career in sports journalism.

Where are you from?
I am from Aurora, Neb. Aurora is a town of 4,000 people and is around 70 miles away from Lincoln.

Tell me a little about your family life?
I have one younger sister. I am married, but do not have any kids right now.

Why did you choose K-State?
The big thing for me was the academics. I was interested in the architecture program. Iowa State was really the only school I looked at to go to as they both have great architecture programs. The reason why I chose K-State is because even though Manhattan is not a tropical paradise, it is way better than Ames, Iowa.

When did you realize what you wanted to do?
It was kind of evolutionary progress. I went to K-State and wanted to be an architect and design golf courses. However, six weeks into that, I realized that I wanted to do something involved with journalism. I loved journalism, but then law started to appeal to me. It was not where I wanted to give up journalism, but I wanted to broaden my horizon, so I started to take some law classes at K-State. After K-State, I went to law school and continued to follow K-State sports.

How did the site come together?
It happened when I was in law school in Houston. There are all kinds of ways that you can follow the sports, but I felt a little disconnected from K-State sports. I was so far from K-State and I was unable to fully feel like I knew what was going on, so I wanted to start my own sports site. I had read many blogs and thought it would be fun to start my own. The guy who runs orangebloods.com then recognized me and he gave me the opportunity to run the K-State blog.

How do you balance between being a lawyer, running the site and seeing your wife?

I was spoiled as a law student because I had a lot more time to do both school and write articles. You go to school for an hour or an hour and a half, come home, eat lunch and then go right back to another class. After that class, it is only around 2:30, so you have plenty of time to go write a bunch of articles. It is tougher now because I have an 8 to 5 job, so it makes it more difficult to keep up with the website. It also would not be 100 percent professional of me to being working on the website while I am here at my office. At the end of the day, I enjoy doing it so that is what keeps me doing it. I enjoy putting out topics and seeing the reaction that I get from fans and just seeing other people talk about their opinions. It is hard, though, as my wife likes to have time with me, but I love everything going on in my life, so I cannot complain.

What would you say to people who have a dream of being a sports journalist?

My advice would be to do what you can to get published. Do what you can to get your work out there. There was a big controversy last year with Rick Reilly when he was talking to the Colorado University graduating class in journalism and he told the students to never give away your writing for free. He lost a lot of respect by people because of this statement. The way the economy is now, you have to be willing to go different ways at getting your stories out. The great and bad thing about this is the Internet. It is a good thing if you are a good writer, people will start to notice you. All you have to do is look at Bill Connelly. Connelly is an absolute prolific writer. He was doing all of this was when he had a day job. He got hired on full-time and is now able to knock out a lot of articles a day. There are many stories like his and if you have to talent and the dedication, then you have a chance to do whatever you want.

NFL
After falling to a 1-4 record after their first five games, the Denver Broncos have chosen to promote Tim Tebow to the team's starting quarterback role. Kyle Orton, who earned the spot after an impressive showing during the offseason, was benched at halftime against the San Diego Chargers. Though Broncos fans were unhappy with the team drafting Tebow two years ago, the crowd was cheering his name as the team ran off the field on Sunday. Denver will take the field with Tebow at the helm against the Miami Dolphins in two weeks after serving a bye this coming Sunday.

MLB
After quickly falling behind in the first inning, the Detroit Tigers managed to put up five runs to clinch game three of the American League Championship Series 5-2. Now trailing the Texas Rangers by just one game, Detroit hopes to keep their World Series hopes alive as the Tigers go into game four with the home-field advantage still on their side. Currently the National League Championship between the St. Louis Cardinals and Milwaukee Brewers is tied at one game apiece.

NBA
The 2011-12 NBA season remains in jeopardy after losing its first two weeks as the lockout continues. However, despite the chance of not having a season, players are still considering creating a league of their own, according to New York Knicks forward Amare Stoudemire. Though the chances of a new league being formed are slim, players hope that a solution similar to the NBA-only league held in Las Vegas can be made into a permanent alternative.

NCAA
The South Carolina Gamecocks have dismissed quarterback Stephen Garcia from the team after five suspensions. The fifth-year senior was released after test results came back positive for marijuana and alcohol. The Gamecocks now look to start sophomore Connor Shaw for the remainder of the season. Shaw has already seen ample playing time this season after taking the field in the second half against Auburn two weeks ago and starting last week against Kentucky in South Carolina's 54-3 win.

Networking boosts students' opportunities in job market

Evert Nelson | Collegian

Students network with employers visiting the 2011 All-University Career Fair, held in the K-State Student Union Courtyard on Sept. 21-22.

Andy Rao
staff writer

In a day and age when education and technology are increasingly accessible, it is becoming harder and harder for people to distinguish themselves from the mass.

According to a July 16 article in the New York Times by David Segal, the number of applications submitted to graduate programs and law schools has jumped due to the lack of good jobs during the recession.

With more and more people going after resume boosters and higher-level degrees, people looking to start careers and even professionals looking to advance their careers face tough competition.

Degrees and knowledge only get you so far, however.

The single most effective way to set yourself apart from the crowd could very well be networking, and according to Drew Maddox, sophomore in finance and accounting, knowing the right people and taking the time to make connections could lead to future success.

"One of the biggest reasons that I decided to get involved on campus when I got to K-State was to form a network," said Maddox.

Maddox said meeting new people and expanding his base of connections was key to him, especially since he is a business major.

"I know for me as a business major, networking can give me a competitive edge," Maddox said. "The better you are at making connections with other people, the greater chance you have at becoming successful."

Maddox, who is involved in Alpha Kappa Psi business fraternity, Student Accounting Society and Phi Delta Theta, said he tries to meet a variety of people so that his network consists of a diverse group of people.

"I like to try and meet different people. I think it's important to extend your connections past just your friends, and meet people who are older than you or majoring in something different."

Drew Maddox
sophomore in finance and accounting

"I like to try and meet different people," he said. "I think it's important to extend your connections past just your friends, and meet people who are older than you or majoring in something different."

Over the past several years, networking has gotten even easier, as websites like Facebook, Twitter and LinkedIn have given people an easier and quicker way to network. Today, somebody in the United States can video chat a potential employer in China at the click of a button.

"One thing that makes social networking cool is that can connect you to things that you would otherwise never have been a part of, or even knew that it existed," said Ariel Anib, senior in women's studies and sociology.

Anib added that the term "networking" shouldn't limit people to meeting just their peers.

"I think having professors in your personal network is probably one of the most important connections you could have as a college student," Anib said. "I know as a freshman in college, I noticed how much larger class sizes were compared to high school, and it made me realize that I had to take the initiative and introduce myself to my teachers."

Anib said that her connections with her professors has helped her gain recommendations, get advice from mentors and even helped her become more comfortable conversing in class.

"Every single one of the teachers I have taken a class from knows who I am," Anib said. "I'm glad I took the advice to introduce myself to my professors as a freshman, because the classes don't feel so large when the teacher knows your name."

For others, networking may be about making more personal connections.

"Joining organizations in college is a once in a lifetime opportunity, and is a great way to make friends and meet other students whom you may have never met otherwise," said Jake Unruh, sophomore in industrial engineering. "I've really enjoyed the interaction with the various people I've met through organizations, and I believe the experience I've gained while in these organizations will help me network more in the future."

Unruh also said he believes that networking will help him become successful in achieving his personal goals both during college and after he graduates.

"For me, networking is an integral part to being successful in college," said Unruh. "Being able to make connections with others and having that experience of networking can be a huge asset for life after college."

With stiff competition already in the workforce, networking is a necessary tool for students to remain competitive, and even relevant.

After all, we all have heard the saying, "It's not what you know, it's who you know."

Study shows using curse words reduces perception of pain

Lindsay Beardall
staff writer

A study proves saying certain four-letter words after a bump or bruise could actually lessen the experience of pain.

From the student who bikes to class and does a face-plant to the person who trips up the steps of a lecture hall in front of 300 classmates, moments of embarrassment and ensuing pain are a daily nuisance. Situations like these call for desperate measures - or perhaps a curse word or two. A 2009 study published in Neuro-Report, a neuroscience research journal, instructed individuals to hold one hand in ice-cold water and choose either an expletive or neutral word to express the pain experienced. All 67 volunteers reported less pain and endured 40 seconds longer on average when they chose the expletive.

The abstract for the study reported, "The observed pain-lessening (hypoaesthetic) effect may occur because swearing induces a fight-or-flight response and nullifies the link between fear of pain and pain perception."

Timothy Rozell, associate professor of animal sciences and industry, teaches anatomy and physiology. He said that pain is basically an action potential, meaning electricity rises and falls within a cell, a pain receptor. It is the brain's response to this action that causes the feeling of pain. He said that there are also different types of pain receptors as well. Some receptors respond to chemicals, tissue damage, or hot and cold temperatures.

There is also a pain gate theory, Rozell said.

"My understanding of the 'pain gate' theory [is that] a person or animal can reduce or 'gate' the amount of pain being perceived simply by changing how they think about that pain," he said. "In other words, there are actually times where you can tell yourself 'that doesn't hurt' and the perception of pain may lessen."

He also explained there is a natural analgesic, or painkilling, response triggered by the body's sympathetic nervous system, which is where the fight-or-flight reflex comes from.

"This is the likely explanation for stories such as those of combat veterans who were wounded but didn't even realize it until some point after the stress of combat was removed. Perhaps getting mad and screaming and yelling activates this response?" Rozell said.

In a July 13, 2009, Reuters article called by Belinda Goldsmith, one of the men involved with the study, Richard Stephens, wrote that swearing may still be around after centuries because swearing triggers not only an emotional response, but a physical one, too. The article also reported that swearing might increase aggression, although the how and why behind the link between cursing and pain tolerance is still unknown.

"Taboo words, like curse words, are very heavily emotion-laden, so areas of the brain involved with emotion would be triggered more than usually would be the case with language processing," said Richard Harris, professor of psychology.

As a psychologist with counseling services, Jane Hansen works with clients who experience chronic pain related to accidents or illness. She explained that often, people hide their pain and "grin and bear it," which can sometimes make the experience of pain worse and delay healing time.

She said swearing is like "a breakdown in the plan, it's a shattering of the armor. That's why it feels so good."

She said it compares to animals in the wild that physically show their pain with noise or injured movement, saying animals live in the present moment more so than humans.

"That we don't care who is around or who hears us curse lets us be deeply in the present moment; I would argue this is actually the healing element" Hansen said. "When we let ourselves feel exactly what is happening, without trying to change it or make it pretty for anyone else — this is what feels better."

10 things not to say to cops

David Shroyer

In college, people learn new and interesting things. They also tend to enjoy their "nightlife," and when you add up that up with a collegiate education, sometimes you get a very undesirable concoction — especially when the police are involved.

Don't repeat what your political science teacher said about Obama. Don't repeat all the perverted things Freud said. And don't think you know the law when you have one semester of criminology under your belt.

With all these new ideas floating around in a student's head, one might get the urge to make a stand or speak out about them. Well, don't — under the circumstances at least. Here are a few simple things not to say to a police officer when you are running amuck on the town, trying to enjoy your "nightlife."

1. YOU'RE NOT GOMER PYLE AND THIS ISN'T MAYBERRY

Don't try to citizen's arrest a cop - it never works. It doesn't matter what you saw or think you saw them do, lawful or not. They have a gun. Don't mess with them. And chances are, they will think you are incapable of maintaining your composure and apprehend you for "further evaluation."

2. DON'T BE A PERVERT

Don't ever walk up to an officer and ask them if they have a nightstick in their trousers or if they are just happy to see you. Yes, it is a nightstick, and no, they are not happy to see you. But what they are happy to do is throw you straight in jail.

3. DON'T BLURT OUT RANDOM STATEMENTS

Don't tell a cop you kidnapped the Lindbergh baby. Chances are they have no idea who the Lindbergh baby is. Especially if you have no idea who the Lindbergh baby is. Don't blurt out random things when you have no idea what you are talking about. You end up looking like an idiot — or insane.

4. DON'T ASSUME INTELLECTUAL SUPERIORITY

Don't tell a police officer you know more than they do. Maybe you do, maybe you don't. Fact is, they wear a Batman utility belt that weighs like 30 pounds. Do you think they have time to mess with your shenanigans?

5. THIS ISN'T BASEBALL

Never walk up to a cop, pat him on the butt, and tell him good game. Bad idea.

6. DON'T ACT LIKE A CHILD

Don't go up to a cop and tell them you can pull your gun faster than they can and quick-draw your fingers while making the gun sound you made as a kid while playing cops and robbers.

7. DON'T TRY TO BE SMOOTH

Don't try that new pick-up line your buddy just told you on a cop. It won't work. Believe that.

8. AND THE BUNNY GOES AROUND THE TREE AND INTO THE HOLE...

Don't walk up to cops, stick your foot out, wiggle it in front of them and ask them to tie your shoe. They will not oblige you, but what they will do is zip-tie your hands to a stop sign.

9. ANATOMICAL COMPARISONS DON'T HELP YOU OUT

Don't tell a cop you have a bigger nightstick or gun than they have. This goes with No. 2 and No. 6. Yes, this is funny. No, they don't think so.

10. DON'T TEMPT THEM; THEY HAVE A JOB TO DO

Don't ask a cop if their idea of "good cop bad cop" involves their handcuffs, a pitching wedge, a snorkel and the King James Bible. If they have a mustache, you may have just made their night.

With a college education comes experience. We all like to feel like we are getting our money's worth, but if you are having to fork over sacred Chipotle money for bail, you're probably not getting the experience and money's worth your parents anticipated you were getting.

So next time you think it's cute to harass a cop, just think about that unsavory sweaty person you are going to be bunked up with in county jail for the duration of the night. Remember, in front of that puffed out chest sits a nice and shiny badge and they are just dying to use it.

SGA to discuss allocation of funds

Jakki Thompson
staff writer

The Student Senate will be voting on allocating funds to both the League of United Latin American Citizens and the Collegiate Entrepreneurs Organization. An introduction of new legislation will include active membership requirements for travel requests. There will also be the possibility for the allocation of fees to KSU Heifer International. The Student Governing Association student activity fee funding regulations will be addressed in legislation that will be introduced. New organization to assist Johnson Center for Basic Cancer Research

staff writer

A new organization called the K-State Cancer Fighters has joined the K-State campus in collaboration with the Johnson Center for Basic Cancer Research. The papers were filed with the Office of Student Activities and Services and the group officially registered about three weeks ago.

"This is a student organization that is a 'friends of' the cancer center research groups," said Marcia Locke, adviser and public relations and outreach coordinator for the Johnson Center. "They are ambassadors, volunteers and fundraisers for our center, but they are all students."

Locke said one of the main goals for the group is to raise awareness of the group and the cancer center on campus and in the community. The research center is run solely on fundraising that comes from outside sources. The group will hopefully help bring more money in to help fund more of the new projects the cancer researchers are working on, Locke said.

"I am a leadership studies minor and we would have many inspirational speakers come in and speak to us during our senior seminar," said Zach Zaborny, president of KSCF and senior in journalism and mass communication. "I knew that I wanted to do something in cancer research because it is close to my heart. I lost my grandfather due to cancer last April."

Zaborny said when he originally approached Locke about the idea of the group, he didn't really know what to expect. But Locke and Zaborny both said the idea was great, so they ran with it.

Locke said she wanted to get more students involved with the Johnson Center for Basic Cancer Research. She received a couple of inquiries on how to help out or volunteer for the cancer center every month. When Zaborny approached Locke with the idea about the new student organization, it was the perfect opportunity for both of them, Locke said.

Zaborny said he began recruiting people for the KSCF group from the cancer research award winners' database. The cancer research award winners are 50 undergraduate students that get to work in the cancer research labs with a professor on a particular research project. These students get the opportunity to work on a real research team and participate in the actual laboratories. Locke said most graduate students get opportunities like this, but not undergraduates.

"I began working in a lab my third semester into college, so the fall of my sophomore year," said Leonie Bossmann, vice president for KSCF and senior in biology and anthropology. "I am a two-time winner and I just reapplied this year for my third year to work on another project. Being a part of this has helped me put into perspective that what I do is important and having what I do be recognized was even better."

Bossmann said she didn't think twice about joining the group after she had received the email from Zaborny. Bossmann said after her grandfather had died from cancer and her mom was diagnosed with skin cancer, she knew this was the area of medicine she wanted to pursue. Bossman said she knew this group would help promote the research being conducted here on campus.

"Part of this group was to bring more awareness to the cancer center. Another part of this was to get students involved in something that affects students ... who have cancer, have family members who have cancer or who have lost someone due to cancer."

Zach Zaborny
president of KSCF and senior in journalism and mass communication

"Part of this group was to bring more awareness to the cancer center," Zaborny said. "Another part of this was to get students involved in something that affects students. Students who have cancer, have family members who have cancer or who have lost someone due to cancer is a way for students to connect to the larger cause of what we are doing."

Bossmann said she would like to see the group put on a seminar that helps people who have been diagnosed with cancer or who know people who have it. This seminar could talk about things like what cancer is and what type of treatment options are available and set up a network where these students and faculty members affected by cancer can connect.

"We would like to see anyone come to the meetings who are willing to come out and help," Zaborny said. "Everything we are planning on doing will be volunteer based. This is an organization that isn't political, it's about students identifying with this for the philanthropic reasons."

Meetings will be held in the Johnson Center for Basic Cancer Research conference room every first and third Monday at 5 p.m. The meetings are open for anyone to attend.

"It's exciting to see students wanting to get involved," Locke said. "This is going to be a great group of students because they are helping K-State students and faculty."

New organization celebrates women in design

Kelsey Peterson

A new organization, Women In Design, has been created for female interior designer students. The organization was launched on Sept. 26 with eight members and currently has more than 90 members.

Samantha McCloud, president of the organization and graduate student in architecture, founded the organization in order to have a campus connection with designers in the community and design culture on campus.

"Since K-State didn't have a chapter, I thought it was a great opportunity to start something that could help everyone and a good way for people who are interested in the same ideas," McCloud said.

"It is about making connections for students who are interested in design and celebrating design by contributing to the community," said Jessica Symons, vice president and graduate student in architecture.

Women in Design is a national organization and has associations in Kansas City, Denver and the University of Kansas. It was originally designed for women in architecture because architecture was a male-dominated field. Women in Design made a support group for the emerging professional women in architecture. Today, the organization works with many different design fields, including landscape, architecture, engineering, interior, graphic, art and fashion.

"It's about branching out and coming together. We want all of the design fields to feel supported," Symons said.

Though the name suggests otherwise, membership is not limited to women. The organization is open to anyone, but celebrates female designers specifically.

"We are bringing in women speakers to talk to our organization, but by no means this is just a women's group. Everyone is invited," McCloud said.

K-State Women in Design aims to connect with the design community and provide networking opportunities with professionals. Organizers plan to bring speakers to the group and set up socials for organizations. The organization also creates a network and community on campus between the different design colleges by creating a setting for students to mingle and connect.

The organization also plans to contribute to the community. A canned food drive for the Flint Hills Breadbasket is currently in the works.

"We plan on making something out of the cans that will be held in the Bosco Plaza, before we donate the cans to the Flint Hills Breadbasket," Symons said.

Wendy Ornelas, faculty adviser for Women in Design and associate dean and professor for the College of Architecture, said students should join the organization because "it's important for students, faculty and staff across the university to know that there are people that are passionate about design."

Meetings are held at 7:30 p.m. on Mondays in the Pierce Commons in Seaton Hall. The organization has a Facebook group page called "Women in Design KSU Group," which has all the meetings listed.

Museum to celebrate Eisenhower's 121st birthday

Laura Mushrush
contributing writer

Editor's Note: This article was completed as an assignment for a class in the A.Q. Miller School of Journalism and Mass Communications.

The Dwight D. Eisenhower Presidential Library and Museum in Abilene plans to celebrate the 121st birthday of former U.S. President and Kansas native Dwight Eisenhower on Friday. Eisenhower was raised in the town of Abilene where the museum was built in his honor. A number of activities will be held at the museum over the weekend in celebration.

Eisenhower was the country's 34th president and served two terms in office from Jan. 30, 1953, to Jan 20, 1961. A few years after graduating from high school in Abilene, Eisenhower received admission into the United States Military Academy at West Point. Eisenhower graduated in the upper half of his class in 1915. On July 1, 1916, he married Mamie Geneva Doud. He led a career in the military and was selected as chief of staff, U.S. Army, in 1945.

A vigil will be held on Friday starting at 4:30 p.m. and ending at 7 a.m. the following morning. The Kansas Veterans of Foreign Wars will be standing post over the grave site of the former president. Following the vigil will be a wreath laying ceremony at 10:30 a.m. on Saturday. The procession to Eisenhower's grave will be led by members of the First Infantry Division, Maj. Gen. William C. Mayville Jr. and Command Sgt. Maj. James Tomson.

A firing squad and colors will be presented by the Chapman Post 240 at the Eisenhower Statue as part of the Kansas American Legion Annual Pilgrimage. They have posts all over Kansas and representatives from each division will be present for the ceremony. Gov. Sam Brownback will be the featured speaker at the Eisenhower Legacy Dinner on Saturday evening.

Activities have been held in Abilene for Eisenhower's birthday since 1970 and became an annual event in 1999. Approximately 1,000 people are expected to attend.
